It may seem as though your boss has everything; success, wealth and a great lifestyle, but what if you suspect that they're missing that someone special? Maybe, a resourceful, helpful and well-organised PA would want to help, but what's the best way of tackling it? Firstly it's probably best you assess your relationship with your boss, if you've only been working for them a few months, it's a good idea that you get to know them a bit better before you offer to help organise their love life! After that, you should try find out if they are actually looking for a relationship, but if your boss is the of the opposite sex, be careful they don't mistake your hints for an inappropriate chat-up line. So be discreet, perhaps give an example of a friend in a similar role who has just successfully helped their boss find the love of their life. This should encourage a response from them that would let you know whether they would be open to the idea themselves.

However, don't feel it is your duty to find someone; being a matchmaker is not part of your job description and if it is unwanted then it may prove embarrassing for both of you by pushing the issue too far. Try and pick up on the signs they give when speaking about relationships and use your intuition.

Your boss probably has a very busy lifestyle so may find it difficult to meet people, and it is unlikely that you will find someone suitable for them in your local bar. It would also be very embarrassing to approach someone on behalf of your boss. Working as a professional matchmaker I have noticed there has been a distinct increasing trend in individuals coming to us for matchmaking assistance on behalf of their boss or manager, which enables them to maintain hectic work schedules and busy lifestyles. Remember, your boss is a successful and professional person with very little time on their hands. They would suit someone with a similar lifestyle who is likely to be more understanding of work commitments, be independent and ultimately, compatible.

If you do succeed and your boss finds himself in a new relationship, there are a few things you can do to help love blossom. Make a note of special occasions, such as a birthday, and ask them in advance what their gift ideas are, or perhaps do some extra work for them to ensure that they leave the office on time for a date.
